much alike.
I admit that the same elemental desires and passions are present in all B. of us.

But in such different proportions and so differently combined and deand so differently combined and de-veloped, that we may be as different from one another as one piece of mu-sic from another. "I Am Afraid to Go Home in the Dark" and the Jewel Song in Faust may both contain the same elemental notes, but these are certainly so combined and proportion ed that the pieces of music

"Don't tell me," says the woman with the serpent's tongue, "that any girl could be alone in an office with a man as much as his stenographer is with him—and you know how fascin-ating he is—and be perfectly straight." You are judging someone else by your own power of resisting temptation, Mrs. Gossip. Don't. Maybe you couldn't do it, but you have no right

They to assert that she couldn't. "You certainly don't think," says the business man, "that a man with his opportunities for grafting and without the slightest danger of getting caught, doesn't turn a penny on the side once in a while. I guess both your parents came from Missouri." Thereby, Mr. Business Man. you register your opinion of your own power to resist temptation and try to judge someone else by it. Don't.

Maybe you know the temptation would be too much for you, but that most emphatically doesn't give you the right to say it would be too much for your neighbor.

People who try to make a foot rule of themselves whereby to measure hood-"a pint's a pound the world round."

You can't any more make of your-self a measure for other people than you can say a pint of feathers weighs an ounce, and therefore two pints of lead would weigh two ounches, These I have given are examples looking upwards, but it's just the same looking down. You haven't any right to judge anyone who yields to temptation as weak because the temptation would have meant little to you.

All the differences of makeup, of heredity, of environment stand in the way of such a judgment.
Of course you remember Omar's,
"After a momentary silence spake Some vessel of a more ungainly make; They sneer at me for leaning all awry; What! did the Hand then of the Pot-
